POMPANO BEACH, Fla -- A fishing boat charter captain made a gruesome discovery while gutting a 9-foot long shark: a bone inside the predator's belly.

Broward County Sheriff's deputies said the captain thought the bone was human and called police. However, the six-inch bone turned out not to be human.

Related Content: Images

Captain Mark Quartiano -- who is known locally as "Mark the Shark" -- was gutting the fish Friday morning; a client had caught the 400-pound male bull shark the day before off the coast of Key Biscayne.

Mark said finding what he thought was a human bone was very scary.

“It's kind of weird,” he said. “I've cut thousands and thousands of sharks open and never came across a human bone before. A lot of bones, but not humans.”

Quartiano said the bone, and some small fish, spilled out of the shark. The bone "still had skin on it," the captain told a local TV station.

Crime scene techs responded and took the bone to the county medical examiner's office, where it was determined that the bone was not human.

Copyright 2008 by NBC6.net The Associated Press contributed to this report. All rights reserved.
This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.